I like your section + subsection navigation hierarchies and how they both function similarly (italics when hovered), but the Anatomy sub-navigation has the dashed line in addition to it – very cohesive user interaction.

However, when the text rides up there is overlap with the navigation and content. Consider a fade or a black background for the navigation so that the content will go underneath.

I'm also wondering if you could add some visual dynamism to the sections. Besides a header, body, and an image at the moment, each section is very plain. The style of the page is formal and standard which doesn't really match with the two funky quotes that you have about how to eat them, and no eyes no feet.

Thus, consider some extra styling (color, visual graphics) and also consider having a funky sub-header for each of the sections – they are fun!

I'd also like something visual to help indicate the breaks between the four main sections beyond larger margins. Again, maybe consider coloring the headers or adding some visual graphic to help distinguish the sections a bit more.

Can you also add something wormy – if possible? Squiggly giggle goo.
